'He who takes away the sin of the world'

We need to have our brokenness repaired, and our wounds healed.

The healing process is long and often painful. It comes through a relationship of love with another person. This is precisely what Jesus came to do. He went down among sinners. He associated with them, so much so that he was branded as one of them, though he was whole and innocent. He sought out those who were lost and discarded, gave them a sense of worth, and restored them to the friendship and love of the heavenly Father. This was the Good News. But of course it was only good news for those who recognised their brokenness and who longed for wholeness. To be redeemed, then, is to be made whole and well. It is to be restored to our original brightness through the grace of the Holy Spirit. However, this is a lifelong process.

Besides personal sin and personal redemption, there is social sin and social redemption. It is not only individuals who are broken. The unity of the whole human family is broken because of sin. People are alienated from one another and from God. Jesus came to bring us back to one another and to our heavenly Father. He came to gather together the new People of God, made up not just of the tribes of Israel, but of all the peoples of the world.

'It is an extra ordinary thing for people with a handicap (and we are all handicapped) to discover that they are loved'. (Jean Vanier).

'When a man stops believing in God he doesn't then believe in nothing, he believes anything.'
